

Kelley had no idea what she was going to do with the rest of her summer. It was mid-July, and school did not start for six more weeks. Kelley counted all of her summer activities on her fingers. "Let's see," she said. "I rode a horse this summer. I went to the beach this summer, too, but now I'm bored."

As Kelley sat on the front porch, she watched some adults running past her, jogging. "Boy, those people look sweaty," she thought. Suddenly Kelley had a thought. Why not set up a lemonade stand so people could get a cool drink as they ran? The more Kelley thought about the idea, the more she liked it. "What I'll do is give them a free sample the first day," she thought. "After the first day, I'll charge them 20 cents a glass," Kelley said to herself.

The next morning, Kelley went to the kitchen and made a big pitcher of lemonade. Then she put the pitcher in the refrigerator so the lemonade would get cold. During the morning she built a lemonade stand out of wood. That afternoon, as the sun grew hot, she carried the stand out to the front lawn. Carefully she carried the lemonade outside and set it on the stand. As soon as a jogger came by, Kelley yelled, "Free lemonade!" Everyone who came by stopped to get some of Kelley's lemonade. Kelley told them that today she would give them a free sample of lemonade. However, from now on, she would charge them 20 cents a glass. The people said that her lemonade was good. They said they would be glad to pay any price. Every day, Kelley set up her lemonade stand in the hot sun and sold lots of lemonade.

After two weeks, Kelley had made five dollars. She felt very rich. She took her money down to the store and bought lots of candy and comic books. Kelley decided that earning money to buy things was fun. She also thought helping people out by giving them a cold drink on a hot day was fun.

Kelley had no idea what she was going to do with the rest of her summer. It was mid-July, and school did not start for six more weeks. Kelley counted all of her summer activities on her fingers. "Let's see," she said. "I rode a horse this summer. I went to the beach this summer, too, but now I'm bored."

As Kelley sat on the front porch, she watched some adults running past her, jogging. "Boy, those people look sweaty," she thought. Suddenly Kelley had a thought. Why not set up a lemonade stand so people could get a cool drink as they ran? The more Kelley thought about the idea, the more she liked it. "What I'll do is give them a free sample the first day," she thought. "After the first day, I'll charge them 20 cents a glass," Kelley said to herself.

The next morning, Kelley went to the kitchen and made a big pitcher of lemonade. Then she put the pitcher in the refrigerator so the lemonade would get cold. During the morning she built a lemonade stand out of wood. That afternoon, as the sun grew hot, she carried the stand out to the front lawn. Carefully she carried the lemonade outside and set it on the stand. As soon as a jogger came by, Kelley yelled, "Free lemonade!" Everyone who came by stopped to get some of Kelley's lemonade. Kelley told them that today she would give them a free sample of lemonade. However, from now on, she would charge them 20 cents a glass. The people said that her lemonade was good. They said they would be glad to pay any price. Every day, Kelley set up her lemonade stand in the hot sun and sold lots of lemonade.

After two weeks, Kelley had made five dollars. She felt very rich. She took her money down to the store and bought lots of candy and comic books. Kelley decided that earning money to buy things was fun. She also thought helping people out by giving them a cold drink on a hot day was fun.

344
351