

Tad pedaled his bicycle as fast as he could because the sun was setting quickly and Mom got irritated when he was late for dinner. He coasted down the hill of Mills Street and into the driveway where he parked his bicycle. He noticed that Dad's car was in the driveway and thought it unusual that he was home from work so early. He hoped there was nothing wrong and raced into the house via the kitchen door.

"Hello, Tad. How was your day at school, son?" asked Dad. "I had a super day, Dad, but I am worried about why you are home so early today," said Tad. Dad told Tad not to worry because he had some fun news. "I have to take the Graytrack Speedtrain into New York City in the morning for a special business meeting, and I was hoping that you might like to go with me. You could tour the city in a cab for the hour or so that I have to meet with the other men and women and then we could go out to lunch and be finished in time to catch the afternoon train home for dinner," he said.

Tad was so excited that he could not finish his dinner because he had never ridden on a train, and touring New York City would be fun, too. The next morning, Tad put on the suit that he usually wore to church, and he walked downstairs to eat breakfast. Mom and Dad smiled secretly to each other because they knew that Tad wanted to look like a businessman, just like his father.

They boarded the train and sat in a large booth by the window, and the train took off for the city, moving so quickly that the trees looked like a green blur. Soon they arrived at the city where Dad put Tad in a cab and sent him off to tour the city. Tad saw the most wonderful sights, such as skyscrapers and statues, that he could not wait to tell Dad about when they met each other.

Tad pedaled his bicycle as fast as he could because the sun was setting quickly and Mom got irritated when he was late for dinner. He coasted down the hill of Mills Street and into the driveway where he parked his bicycle. He noticed that Dad's car was in the driveway and thought it unusual that he was home from work so early. He hoped there was nothing wrong and raced into the house via the kitchen door.

"Hello, Tad. How was your day at school, son?" asked Dad. "I had a super day, Dad, but I am worried about why you are home so early today," said Tad. Dad told Tad not to worry because he had some fun news. "I have to take the Graytrack Speedtrain into New York City in the morning for a special business meeting, and I was hoping that you might like to go with me. You could tour the city in a cab for the hour or so that I have to meet with the other men and women and then we could go out to lunch and be finished in time to catch the afternoon train home for dinner," he said.

Tad was so excited that he could not finish his dinner because he had never ridden on a train, and touring New York City would be fun, too. The next morning, Tad put on the suit that he usually wore to church, and he walked downstairs to eat breakfast. Mom and Dad smiled secretly to each other because they knew that Tad wanted to look like a businessman, just like his father.

They boarded the train and sat in a large booth by the window, and the train took off for the city, moving so quickly that the trees looked like a green blur. Soon they arrived at the city where Dad put Tad in a cab and sent him off to tour the city. Tad saw the most wonderful sights, such as skyscrapers and statues, that he could not wait to tell Dad about when they met each other.